■ Explaining corporate law

Although often lumped together, corporate and commercial law are slightly different disciplines - with the former representing the branch of law related specifically to companies and business structuring. From mergers & acquisitions to private equity law to corporate disputes, the world of corporate law is wide-ranging and can get pretty complicated.

For the success of your business, you will want expert lawyers to take the wheel. Your lawyers need to be professional and trustworthy, conducting due diligence (the first stage of the mergers & acquisitions process), carefully preparing legal documents for court, protecting your company from legal risks, designing your company's position on legal matters, and negotiating the best deals on your behalf.

- Why might your business require a corporate lawyer?

Corporate lawyers support your growth as a business, taking the pressure off you and your leading execs to keep on top of important processes. They make sure that your company is always working within the law, streamlining the way you work and offering you expert legal advice as you work through huge decisions for your business.

It could be that you need someone on hand to reliably process the normal day-to-day legal documents issued by your corporation. Maybe you need someone to ensure that all regulatory measures are compliant with national requirements, or you need someone to streamline and manage the mergers & acquisitions process - whichever form it may take.

If you own or represent a business or corporation, don't leave the legal side of things to chance. You need reliable, hard-working, professional (and friendly) corporate solicitors to take the reins. That sounds like us.
